Dear Mark Zuckerberg,

Hello, I'm Gavin McCormack, a sixth-grade student passionate about making a difference. I'm reaching out to discuss an issue that affects millions globally – hunger. I recently learned that over 690 million people worldwide are hungry – that's almost 9% of the global population. This is why the Sustainable Development Goal 2: Zero Hunger, resonates with me deeply.

In my own town, I witness the harsh reality of food insecurity. Seeing friends at school unable to get a nutritious meal is both saddening and motivating. It's not just a local issue; it's a problem that extends across continents. This disparity in a world of abundance is difficult to comprehend.

Your achievements with Facebook and your influential status place you in a unique position to address such global challenges. I'm curious about your thoughts on using technology and wealth to combat hunger. Do you have initiatives or plans to tackle this issue? Your strategies could serve as a significant learning opportunity and inspiration for us.

I believe technology has the potential to revolutionize food production and distribution. For instance, advancements in agricultural technology can enhance crop yields, and digital platforms can facilitate better distribution of food resources. How do you envision using technology to contribute to this cause?

Sharing your insights on these matters could immensely benefit students like us. It would not only educate us but also inspire us to think creatively about solutions. Our teacher always encourages us to think big and reminds us that even as sixth graders, we have the power to effect change.

Receiving a response from you would be incredibly inspiring. It would show us that our voices matter and that we, too, can contribute to solving world issues like hunger. Your reply could be a guiding light, encouraging us to take meaningful actions in our communities.

Thank you for taking the time to read my letter. I eagerly await your thoughts and hope to learn from your experiences and initiatives.

With great respect and anticipation,
Gavin McCormack

Ten Tips To Write With Passion

Start Strong: Begin your letter with something exciting or important about your topic, like talking right away about how serious hunger is in your letter to Mark Zuckerberg.

Make it Emotional: Share feelings in your letter to make it more powerful, like talking about how sad hunger makes you feel.

Use Facts: Include some real numbers or facts to show how big the problem is.

Ask Questions: Write questions for the person you're writing to, like asking what they can do to help.

Tell Your Story: Share your own experiences or what you see around you about the problem.

Suggest Ideas: Offer your own ideas on how they can help solve the problem.

Be Hopeful: Talk about how you think things can get better.

Include Everyone: Use words that make it feel like you and the reader are working together.

Talk About Their Power: Mention how the person you're writing to is in a good position to help, like how Mark Zuckerberg has a lot of money and can do a lot.

End with a Bang: Finish your letter with a strong sentence that they will remember.
